Race, Ethnicity, and Place in a Changing America John W. Frazier, Eugene L. Tettey-Fio

Twenty-first century America provides an opportunity to explore geographic re/ minders of America's race problems, and the cultural and ethnic patterns, that geographers/ have studied for centuries. There is an educational imperative to provide today's student/ s with examples and explanations of American human geography, which has never been more re/ levant than today. To illustrate the breadth of these ethnic and racial issues, we invited/ selected participants of the landmark 2004 /223Race, Ethnicity, and Place Conference/224 / at Howard University to rewrite their research findings for an undergraduate audience. Thi/ rty-seven authors, mostly geographers but other social scientists, participated with us in/ the production of this volume. Section one of this text provides a foundation using several concepts and perspectives of / race and ethnicity as they relate to geographic space, place, and landscapes, ranging from/ a victim viewpoint (Malcolm X) to educational policy perspective, and from the changing i/ mportance of place as an immigrant gateway to the personal perspective of a first-generati/ on U.S. immigrant. The remainder of the text contains four sections that blend historical/ geographic patterns of minorities and contemporary and emerging racial and ethnic pattern/ s across the nation. Each section deals with diverse ethnic groups that have been racially/ classified as a single group. Exploring these individually brings a greater understanding/ of similarities and differences among diverse cultures. Finally, the last section provide/ s a number of examples of increasing ethnic diversity among American minority populations,/ expression of culture and ethnicity, and the issues they create.
