Not illustrated. 1883 Excerpt: ... in London. It was of no use to follow them, so he had to content himself with waiting until they returned, and thus, as we have seen, there was a joyful re-union. In the quietness and peace of the little home it was difficult for any of the household to realise the misery of the past few hours,, and all Jennie's intended chiding of Eeuben for his enlistment was forgotten in the joy of having him back again, and in gratitude to her heavenly Father for the wonderful way in which He had answered her prayer, and brought light in the darkest season through which poor Jennie had yet been called to pass. But now there was the future to be thought of. Jennie showed Eeuben the letter from the grocer in Eawstone, offering him a situation. It was much too late then to think of going there; but in the morning Jennie and her husband came back to their home, and Eeuben went round to Mr. Goodson, the grocer, who had a business in another part of the same street in which Eeuben had been previously employed. Mr. Goodson was rather inclined to be angry that no notice had been taken of his letter on the previous day. He had now advertised in the county paper, and he said he should wait a day or two and see whether he had any replies to this advertisement before he engaged Eeuben. Here was another disappointment. He had expected to be taken ont once. Their cash was getting less and less, and Eeuben had eagerly thought of this situation, as being an immediate means of getting a fresh supply. And now, perhaps, a more eligible candidate might offer, and the situation be lost to Eeuben after all. However, there was nothing for the young couple to do but to wait and hope for the best. Nothing, except to pray. And what an exception this is! How often, in the dark seasons of our lif...
