As a kid, Doyle Emerson formed an unlikely friendship with Tommy Two Kills, an Oglala Sioux growing up in Doyle's home town a few miles off the reservation. The pair were outcasts until they led the high school football team to four South Dakota state championships, big, lumbering Doyle blowing holes in the defensive line that allowed Tommy to score. The two outcasts forced respect from the community on the football field. Doyle rode his fame to a job as Deputy Sheriff, while Tommy slipped back into the untouchable caste after the glory died and the trophies gathered dust.

When Tommy moves back to the Reservation, his people consider him an outcast because he grew up in the white world.

In the Spring of 1972, a rancher checking his cattle finds the mutilated body of Mary Strong Bear in his pasture a few miles off the reservation. Tommy's cousin Nikki Two Kills vanishes the same day. The rumor that Doyle Emerson killed Mary Strong Bear and kidnapped Nikki Two Kills spreads across the reservation.

When Sheriff Ed Welsh declares Mary Strong Bear dead of exposure to the elements, Tommy Two Kills decides to exact revenge and gain the respect of his tribe. Tommy's brand of justice sets off a sequence of events that reach from the reservation to the political power center in Washington, DC.
